AN ODE.

At the reinterment of the remains of the Confederate dead in Grace Church Cemetery, near Washington, on Friday last, an account of which appeared in the Gazette, Bishop Pinckney delivered the following ode:

With measured step we to the spot repair,
Where our honored dead would lay to rest.
A tear we drop upon the soft, fresh sod,
While skies above us do their tents unfold,
And winter's chilling blast is on the air,
And scarce a bird doth trill its matin-song,
Or soothe to rest the tranquil hour of eve;
And yet we would a garland throw of flowers
Upon the graves we dig in silence here,
And draw a satisfaction sweet indeed
From act of love paid to the sleeping dead.
We would this day and hour commemorate,
Yet in the depths of ocean lay the pearls,
Nor seen to mortal eye, deep hidden there;
And to the page of history unknown
Are heroes who, within another sphere,
Will take their place, the brightest of the throne.

These fell unnoted 'mid the cannon's roar
Beneath the flag they did so bravely wave
Regardless of the perils of the field;
And when they fell, no mother's hand was near,
Nor sister's loved, nor brother's loved as they,
The death dew-drop from the pallid brow to wipe,
Or whisper in the ear sweet words of love,
Or speak of home, the dear ancestral Hall,
Or river on whose flower-embellished banks
They woke the echoes of their gleeful step,
Or noble oak beneath whose quiet shade
They dreamed those dreams of fairer days ahead,
Which they would never more on earth behold.
And yet the weepers on the hearthstone wept,
Whose tears still linger by the vacant seat,
To tell the scene of desolation there,
Sadness now reigns, where once the smile of joy
Threw o'er the heart its own magnetic spell.

You met the fate a soldier does not dread,
The death upon the dark, ensanguined field,
When at the drum-beat, or the bugle's note,
His gallant step moves quickly to the front,
Sublimely bent to conquer or to die.

Your great commanders have the call obeyed,
And now, like you, they sleep beneath the sod.
The one, among the foremost of the foremost men.

In all the ages of the mighty past,
Whose name will gather beauty, as on air
It floats o'er earth, or o'er the azure sea,
Will high alone in its sublimity.
Symmetrical in form, as pure as brave,
Lee had a mind of vast and varied powers;
While not a dew-drop in its lily cup
Was fresher than the heart that bore it within;
And not a tear-drop, but the emblem was
Of the deep sympathy he felt for all.
It may be questioned whether strength or love
In him was the controlling principle.
One thing we know, he was in all things great.
In each estate of sunshine or of shade,
When on the topmost wave of great success,
Or in the valley of adversity,
He was self-poised, the same meek man of faith.

The other, like a thunderbolt of war,
Resistless in its course, as rapid too,
Remains the marvel of this mortal age,
His name can never die—as long as Tell
Shall live to thrill the ages in their flow,
So long will Jackson live, the one bright star,
To shed its burning lustre high and far,
No more the deafening sound of cannon's roar.

Disturbs the silence of this peaceful hour,
The war is ended, and we, who now repair
To drop a tear upon our dew-washed bier,
May meet as brothers, one in heart and hope,
And feel the kindling of the patriot's flame,
That finds its emblem in the starlit flag,
That waves alike o'er graves where rests awhile

The Northern soldier and Confederate brave, Death consecrates this hour. It soothes the heart,
And hushes into calm repose the feuds
That mar this carking, troublous world of ours.
It bids us weave bright links upon the chain
We would outwine around the brotherhood,
And dew distill, from hearts that banded are,
Of kindly charity and noble deeds.
Sleep on, ye gallant brave, the night-winds sigh,

As they o'er you a sad refrain send forth;
And when the singing birds come back in spring
They will pour forth their song in sweet accord,
And now and then some comrade will repair
To this sweet spot, your valor to recount.
And keep your deeds embalmed in memory.
We feel the touch of sorrow's hallowed hand,
And as we throw the dust upon your graves,
And sigh to think that you are left alone,
We would the grace invoke for each and all
To bring the noble ship our fathers built
To her firm mooring by the mighty Rock—
A ship that stood above the beating waves,
On Independence day, and the grander era,
When from the masthead there waved a banner,

All set with stars, in folds of deepest blue,
The pledge of union and equality,
To hush the passions of this fleeting hour,
And sooth to rest the perturbations of the soul,
And rise victorious o'er our weaker self,
Is wise—'tis beautiful, and fair, and true,
And now our prayer for each and all, who stand

Beside the newly-opened graves to-day,
Is, that we, each, may this self-sought gain,
And live together in sweet harmony
"The star of empire onward, westward rolls,"
And as we gaze upon the splendor cast
O'er the vast firmament it doth illumine,
We feel that not a nation on the globe
Can boast a glory that surpasses ours,
If we but faithful prove to Liberty.

The liberty that rests on changeless law,
The firm adhesion to the spirit breathed,
By patriot fires, the nation's boast and pride,
When they did first the stars and stripes unfurled,

And bid them sweep the pathway of the sky,
Each star accendant on the field of blue,
And yet commingled with each other star
Which on the constellation glows and burns.

much of its component parts, and can certify its medicinal qualities are perfectly harmless."—
